Energy
Reading for April 2008

By Theresa
Chaze

This month the increasing energy will cause many to draw a line in the sand that will be deeper and more resolved than ever before. No longer willing to follow others expectations and rules, they have taken back their power and have started demanding their due. They have claimed their right of free will and have accepted the responsibility for charting their own course in life. No longer satisfied by the Grand Design or being told to wait for their needs to be met, they have rallied their power and have chosen to manifest on their own. No longer led around by the promised carrot, they have banded together as one time enemies see the puppet strings that have manipulated them, not for their good or the spiritual growth of the whole, but to satisfy the ego driven personal agendas of those who had been assigned to guide and protect. However, these guides and protectors have forgotten their role, claiming mastership over those they were assigned to serve. Their actions have not gone unnoticed by those beyond this realm. With the New Moon, the accounting has begun; balance will be restored. The New Age has begun nearly four years early.

The energy that will be brought in from the past is Justice. The long hidden truths will be revealed in such a way that they cannot be denied or excused. The middle of the month a single event will start a cascade that eventually will become an avalanche. Those that hide behind their false authority will find the spotlight shining hotly on them; they will no longer be able to lurk in the shadows as the light will follow them no matter where they run. Ghosts will awaken and join in the hunt for justice, bringing with them the destruction of those who had come to power through deceit and theft. Justice for one will lead to the revelation for three other as well as those far beyond. Those who must took fear in others for respect find that they no longer have the ability to have either. Even a rabbit will turn and fight when it is given no other option.

The month of April is represented by the Knight of pentacles. With the frustration, confusion and uncertainty, many will find themselves stuck--unable to motivate themselves to keep moving forward. However, if they refused to look at the big picture and instead focus on the tasks at hand they will renew their sense of purpose and find their strength of will rapidly returning. Like a house that hasn't been cleaned in ages, to look at the task at a whole, it would be daunting; yet if you focus on one room at a time, the task unfurls itself with ease and grace. So shall we look at this month. As each revelation shakes our infrastructure, if we address each individually, while waiting for the end of the month for the full accounting, we will avoid the much of the paralyzing negative backlash.

The energy that we will take out of April is the nine of wands. This card talks about a new strength and wisdom that will clarify future goals and past mistakes. It is an awakening of personal responsibility and free will. No longer willing to merely exist in their own lives, more people will find their voices and the willing to use them. Simple and easy answers will no longer be good enough. Not only will the masses demand details, but also expect to be told the long range consequences of every possible path. "Because I said so" is not a viable answer to any question. Specific facts and details will have to be given along with the reasoning behind them. There will be a major breaking away from traditions, as once again individualism will be celebrated. However, unlike the seventies, it will not result in a "me only" viewpoint. But that of individuals banning together to restore civil liberties and civil rights. Groups who were in conflict before suddenly find they have common ground and a common enemy.

The challenge we will all face is the four of swords. Many will feel isolated from their dreams and society as whole. It is a time to rest, recuperate and rethink. The long dark night of the soul is over. The dawn is breaking. However, before over reacting, each of us need to stand back and find perspective giving the sunlight the time to drive away the shadows. If we act too quickly, before giving ourselves time to gain objectivity, we become that which we wish to destroy. Do the research. Get the facts. Find the truth. Face the fears. In doing so, not only will the foundation be restored, but also it will be made whole.

Never miss out on a chance to tell someone that you love them; you never know if the opportunity will come around again.

The Changing Times

By Laurie Cabot

A birthday like the passing of a new year is a milestone that can give perspective to life's events.

Many changes have happened since I was born, Witchcraft has become legal and Witches are now free to practice their religion. Still in our multi-cultural, pluralistic society, can we really find universal religious values? Is decriminalization the same as acceptance? When people's consciousness is raised and new freedoms are brought forth such as the civil rights of Witches, it leads to issues of power, and a seeming need to control power; either by justice, injustice, prejudice or often by indifference.

American society hides behind political correctness, but the veneer of tolerance is very thin and does not create real understanding or fosters change.

We have more armed conflicts going on at this very moment than at any time in our history and many are fueled in part or in whole by religious fervor and agendas. For thousands of years the Christians killed anyone who did not agree with them, including other Christians, Muslims, Indians, Jews etc. Their body count stretches across all continents and all cultures. The Muslims happily did the same. Much of this legacy is still with us today.

It was ok to kill the 'savages' as they were not God fearing folks.

Is it naïve to think that we will see Catholics, Muslims, Protestants and Jewish religious leaders come together to speak out against the discrimination and bigotry towards Witches, after all if there is a threat to any minority group, it is a threat to all religious groups! It is a nice thought but I fear it is unlikely. However, I shall always cast spells in hope that the goodness in all religions creates peace.

Witches need the hope that Bigotry against them will end easily. We can expect a good dose of forced political correctness by business and religious organization fearing court actions. But since religious differences are fueling wars with their God as their general, and corporations are destroying this planet, to enrich the bank accounts of executives that will be useless to their own children who will inherit their destructive legacy. What are a few Witches in that equation?

More than you can imagine if we act as one.

Witches do not wage wars, but they do bicker. By forming the Cabot Tradition I have hopes to end this bickering by providing a solid and scientific foundation for Witchcraft. After all I can prove my abilities, have done it for over 50 years, for scientists, government, corporations and weekly for my students. As much as it would please my critics to make me "special" and unique, therefore dismissible as the exception that proves the rule, my students can all do the psychic and majickal things I do. Even those that take Witchcraft One and do not believe, can do wondrous things once they understand the science.

In the meantime, I urge Witches to participate in civic community agencies and volunteer groups as this will create acceptance on a local level. We need to be an integral part of our community and demand equal rights. We need to ensure our power by insisting that our civil rights are observed.

Our fight for justice and equality is imperative to our sacred ways. It is profound to continue our rituals and the observances of our religious practices in the open and to publicly re-establish the voices of our Gods and Goddesses. Thus, building our communities from within and joining with our local societies and our nation.

We ask our Gods and Goddesses to protect us, give us justice, however, our request shall have to be correct in the eyes of our Gods and Goddesses and for the good of all. Witches have no right to revenge.

We know that a Witch understands their religious laws, and it is powerful to follow them; they have no need to do harm. There is enough of that going on, we can turn the tide in the opposite direction. Using our science and art we can educate, create and heal, with our religion we can understand ourselves and others and by working within our society we can bring useful majick to the world.

My thanks and Blessings to all

Let the White Light
Come on DOWN!

By
Rev. Marcy
Drewy

In the clinches it is an absolute and a part of me and the universe. It makes me whole, it makes me larger and more wonderful when it is more than myself. And it is real, it is yesterday, it is today and it is the future, mine and everyone around me. Natural, caring, loving and connected to the All that is. And is, that's the great thing, personal, positive and protecting. It shoots down and around, so bright, so incompassing, so incredible and indescribable. To embrace and hold it is to know. Just to know. And in knowing there is understanding and quiet, so very quiet. Of the mind, of the body and the soul. Absolute peace, complete contentment, love in the totality of everything. Why we look further when it is within us. Not from someone else, not from anywhere in the "great beyond". To look up is to see sky, not to see God and Heaven. To enter from within gives all those golden keys that open every door. Never written, never told from anyone else, never kicked in the head from an "organization", all with their prejudices, hate and bias, we are the one, the only, believe in our way or die. And we will kill you in the name of God, our God, not yours, yours is false, yours is not ours so if you can't conform, you will have to be eliminated.

But then for the real, personal and caring, the spirit knows whether the mind gets it or not. That is all of us, and everything around us, it doesn't take someone else's rule or inaccurate analysis. It only takes what it is inside to have your eyes wide open and to let the flood come in and wash over your heart. Let the white light come on down. Let it come down and wash in, around and over me. So Mote it be!

Shamanism in the Modern World

By Lynn Andrews

Many years ago, a powerful shaman named Twin Dreamers said to me, "We are all born wild like a mountain lion. To live in civilization we become sheep at a very young age. We become tame. But we are not house pets. We are fierce and wild by nature."

Are you fierce and wild by nature?

What thoughts and feelings do these words evoke in you?

Twin Dreamers is a Kuna Indian of Central America. She is also a member of the Sisterhood of the Shields, an extraordinary group of native women who are the guardians of an ancient wisdom born of the sacred feminine that has been preserved and handed down from mother to daughter, shaman to apprentice for many thousands of years, and she is one of my teachers. For the past thirty years, it has been my great opportunity to study and work with the Sisterhood of the Shields, becoming a full member in my own right and a bridge between their ancient and our modern worlds.

There is one thing that the women in the Sisterhood want each of you to know: You are the shamans of the 21st century, no less worthy of the world of sacred healing rituals and the great mystery than traditional shamans centuries ago. The difference is that you and I come into the equation far less prepared. The modern world into which we are born has made it so, for ours is a world that has taught us to move far away from our instinctual natures. Children are told to speak when spoken to; women are taught that to speak of our power is to be shunned by much of society. We are allowed to be beautiful and rich, even famous, but we must not raise our heads above the crowd and be different. Men and women, alike, speak with voices that are strangled by the conditioning of our society and the expectations and demands of others, rather than what is important and true for us.

The modern human being has developed an extraordinary ego. Because of this ego, we think we are better than the flowers, better than the animals and the birds, even better than other human beings and races that are not our own, and we separate ourselves from the world around us. Yet deep inside us is a longing for the wilderness of the spirit and the power of other worlds. We know we have this magical power, for we get glimpses of it when we travel through inner space in the process of healing ourselves, when we see a baby born, watch a flower bloom or find the universe contained within an atom.

But how are we to access this power that we feel all around us and know is there, the unseen power that dwells within the mysterious corners of our lives and calls to us to be better than what we have become? For we have become too accustomed to borrowed knowledge. All our lives, we sit and listen as others tell us about their experiences and dreams, their understanding of the way things work. In school, we sit through lectures, read books and answer questions designed to see if we have learned enough about what is contained within those books, and we are rewarded only if we are able to squeeze ourselves inside the narrow confines of this learning environment. This is a very mental way of learning in which you gain power by going up the ladder, where you will find a few people at the top and everybody else at the bottom, struggling to get up the ladder somehow. And it is a way of learning that spills over into much of what we do for the rest of our lives, long after we have left the formal school system. Tragically, it is also a way of learning that tells us that the unseen power that we know is there really isn't there, precisely because it is unseen. Albert Einstein had enormous problems with this kind of learning, hating rote memorization to the point that one of his teachers suggested he leave school since his being there 'encouraged other students to disrespect their teachers.'

He left high school to study math, physics and philosophy at home and went on to become one of the most brilliant minds of all time.

This is not to diss the school system in a world where quality education can mean the difference between success and failure, even life and death. It is, rather, to acknowledge that there are many things that the modern way of learning leaves us ill equipped to handle. The result is that while our science and technology put the whole world literally at our fingertips, we are living today with greater stress, chaos and confusion than at any other time in human history. And this is where the world of the shaman comes into play.

Shamanism arises from our own experiences. It is very much related to the harmonies of the earth, to finding balance and harmony with all that is around you, regardless of whether you like what is there or not. A shaman knows that all things are alive; that all things are part of the great oneness of life, not separate and apart; that all things have energy, purpose and a far deeper meaning than what we see on the surface. Without the honey bee, there is no pollination.

Without pollination, crops will not grow and our world would face a famine of unfathomable proportions. We are different from the honey bee, yes; we each play vastly different roles in the cycles of life on this earth. But how do we separate ourselves from the honey bee, elevate our "worth" over its? A shaman is one who knows how to choreograph the energies of the universe, of all of life toward a higher purpose.

My shaman teachers have never told me what it is that I must learn. They teach me by putting me in situations - sometimes quite terrifying - where I have to grow and change in order to survive. Then the learning becomes true and real within me, and the teachings become a part of my conscious awareness of my own life. They believe, as do I, that you cannot teach anyone about life, nor can you heal in a world that urgently needs healing, through endless explanation and lecture. People only truly learn through experience, through exploring what confronts them and finding in that situation their own strengths and weaknesses, whether in the physics lab or raising children. Once you do that, you can shift the energies within you to a place of harmony and balance. If you want to find the universe within the atom, you must move into the atom within yourself so that you can explore it from the vantage point that is uniquely yours.

As Ani, a Nepalese hill woman who is also a member of the Sisterhood of the Shields, told me,

People have denied the possibilities of magic, the light that is real even though it cannot be touched. The strange dimensions of life happen just as much as scientific discoveries. In actuality, 'black hole' discoveries are the beginning of proof of the strange and magical dimensions of our existence. 'Strange' usually means only that it is something that occurs out of our frame of reference, out of our realm of experience. 'Strange magic' means beyond our understanding or the limits of our minds, something that is weird and bad. In reality, mind is like a rice bowl and rice is our knowledge. The rice is limited only by the confines of the bowl. Be a magician and stay open to the mysteries. Let your wisdom reach beyond the limits of ordinary mind. Life, existence, is a mystery.

Symbolically, your knowledge is not limited to a simple rice bowl, and that is the way it will always be. Instead of fighting for the rice bowl, fight to make beautiful rice.

Shamanism teaches us how to enter the wilderness of the spirit and the power of other worlds that we so long to experience. Go out into a garden and sit with the plants. Just sit in silence with them. Become one with them; talk to them and let them speak to you. The flowers that have a fragrance are asking you to notice them. They are more highly evolved than the blooms without fragrance. The scent brings you to them and enables them to evolve and become more like you, more human. Then you can truly know the beauty and magic of your fierce and wild nature, because you are it!

"Kabbalah for Consumers" vs. Genuine Wisdom

By
Bnei Baruch

The word "Kabbalah" arouses many, often conflicting, notions. Upon hearing this word, people are reminded of anything from "Madonna, healing spells, and red strings" to "ancient wisdom, eternity, and perfection." Is there any law and order to this mess of associations? And which of them pertains to the true, authentic wisdom of Kabbalah?

The answer is very simple: It depends on who's using this word. The fact is that a person is ready to hear and understand what authentic Kabbalah is only when his "point in the heart" awakens, that is, an aspiration to discover life's purpose and feel his connection to life's source, the Creator. Only such a person is able to grasp Kabbalah.

But for those whose "point in heart" is still dormant, the authentic wisdom of Kabbalah remains impenetrable. This is roughly the same as how we can't transmit the true essence of other types of knowledge to people who haven't first been prepared to use them correctly.

But at the same time, we see that many people practice Kabbalah with all sorts of intentions other than to attain a sensation of the Creator. For example, some people engage in Kabbalah in the hope of mastering miraculous abilities, controlling destiny and manipulating others. The truth is that these endeavors might actually "work wonders" for these people, due to their psychological effects on the people who believe in them.

For example, if a person is convinced that ever since he's started learning Kabbalah, he is acquired unprecedented strength and self-confidence - then he probably did! But this has very little to do with Kabbalah and a lot to do with psychology. (Think about the placebo-effect, where you take a sugar pill believing that it's medicine, and lo' and behold, you are cured within minutes) Altogether, associations like red strings, holy water, magic, and luck have nothing to do with Kabbalah. As said above, Kabbalah is intended only for developing a sensation of the Creator; hence, it isn't intended to make a person psychologically stronger or more self-confident.

This is the core difference between "Kabbalah for consumers" and authentic Kabbalah. The first serves to benefit people who sell red strings, amulets, and other forms of psychological support; the second is for those who truly aspire to discover the Creator and the spiritual world. Everything depends on what a person wants from this wisdom.

If one has "a point in his heart," an aspiration for the Creator, then he has gathered the life experience to finally understand that he can never feel truly satisfied by anything of "this world." He realizes that nothing in this world can bring him true, lasting happiness, since true happiness exists only in the connection with life's source, the Creator. Once a person achieves this profound recognition from within, a Kabbalist is then able to convey spiritual notions and sensations to him, and "pull him up" into the spiritual world of infinity and perfection.

Prayer Power,
First, Not Last

Harry R. G.
Becker

There are hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of people in the United States alone who are praying to God daily for help. Help to find a way to support themselves and their family in a style that is becoming to people who live in the most prosperous country in the world. Help in keeping their car payments current. Better yet, having their car completely paid off so that it will never be taken from them or repossessed. Help in keeping their home mortgage payments current. Better yet, having their home completely paid off so that it will never be taken from them through foreclosure proceedings. Help with health issues through divine healing or having enough money to buy the needed medicines or medical procedures to correct what needs to be done. Help with keeping their apartment or home rent payment current so that they will not be evicted. If you are one of these people or know someone who is, the substance of this article, when applied, can produce enormously favorable results.

If you believe that God does hear your request for help, you can be sure that He does and will come through for you. Millions of miracles through answered prayers are being delivered each day around the world but unfortunately many of the people receiving them forget to give thanks for them when they arrive. Many don't have a clue that it was God answering their prayer not good luck that help came their way. They fail to give thanks to God and totally miss expressing an attitude of gratitude.

Most answered prayer comes in the form of God using another living person on earth to help the person requesting help. It could be in the form of a person in charge of hiring crossing their path and offering them a position. It could be in the form them being prompted to apply for a new or better job and they get it. Healing could come in the form of learning what kinds of foods to eat or special medicine to take. It could also come in the form of an instantaneous divine healing. Whichever way it comes, one must first ask God for it and then believe that He will provide it.

Next, one must be watching and listening daily for its arrival and then immediately give thanks for receiving it when it arrives.

Here are some powerful ideas and solutions for you to turn things around now from the mediocre to the outstanding and from the negative to the positive. Start your day each day by getting on you knees and praying to God for help, like everything you want to have happen depends on Him. Next, get off you knees and go to work like everything depends on you. Also, if you are a believer and have made Jesus Christ your partner in everything that you do in life, TAKING Him wherever you go, and things still are not working well for you, switch drivers.

Lastly, decide that you are going to take action right now to do what it takes to make it happen and believe that it will happen. If you need lots more money and do not already have your own home-based business, get an outstanding one right away. Put your pride on a shelf because you cannot do this by yourself. Pray for what you want. Ask and you will receive the help that you need.

Awaken!

Glasscock

Yes, that is what is happening, all across the globe. People are awakening to their spirituality; seeking universal truths, becoming responsible for their future, and past, and are creating a movement that is sweeping across the Earth.

Many people have sought shelter in traditional religious avenues, and that is ok. Others have gone to more secular teachings, while others still have gained a more esoteric view of religious beliefs and dogma. All of this is perfectly fine, as not everyone resonates with one view of the world.

I am not here to say one belief is better than another, only to share my viewpoint so that you may further examine your own belief system, and come up with your own answers. I only pose what resonates with me at the time, hoping that it will resonate with you on some level and spur you to reach your own conclusions.

With that said, let's talk about the rise in spirituality. What is it really? Why all of a sudden are people seeking what they had not sought before; searching in alternate philosophies, digging deeper into traditional religious texts as well as other ancient but obscure documents? What's happening? And why now?

I'll only attempt to answer a couple of the questions I have posed here with this post. Over the course of the next couple of weeks though, I will try to cover the other questions, as well as any others that might come to mind concerning this issue.

So, let's take on, "Why all of a sudden are people seeking what they had not sought before." This also will cover, "Why now?"

So why is it that people are seeking answers where they hadn't sought them before? Easy, traditional teachings are not providing the answers to what people are facing today. Actually the teachings do, but the ones teaching do not because they are teaching from a limited and literal understanding of what is actually written in their texts.

But people are no longer satisfied to accept things blindly. For some even, they require hard evidence to the truth of things. All of this is nothing more than a desire for knowledge—a knowledge of God. (I use God throughout this post as a reference. That is my word for It. You may choose whatever fits with your belief system, for it is all the same, whatever the name.) This was referred to in ancient times as 'gnosis.' This is what the Gnostics were all about. They believed that one must have an 'inner knowing of God' to be a fully spiritual person. It is also believed by many that Jesus spent time with the Gnostics learning their teachings.

We are seeing this same concept today in many "New Age" texts. And one need look no further than any metaphysical spiritual, or "New Age" teachings to see this is true. So why are people looking for answers though? Need you any more evidence as to this 'why' than the current state of affairs in the world?

Most people feel they and their reality are spinning out of control and ultimately believe they are powerless to do anything about it. But people are now receiving intuitive "nudges" that they are not powerless, but rather extremely powerful beings.

People's beliefs are being shaken as they discover their religious icons are fallible and subject to regressing in their spiritual evolution. People are now thinking that there must be more to this than what we have been taught.

All religions contain truths and should not be dismissed because of the failure of another to hold to a higher standard than we expect of ourselves. However, one religion does not hold all the answers, but the answers must be taken from a study of religious beliefs down through the ages as cummulatively, they all hold all truths.

As I have read, studied, and contemplated my own existence over the last several years, I have come to many conclusions of what "the truth" really is. For me this is a natural and organic process, and one that I have returned to after many years of struggle and turmoil. Now however, things are different and I live a happier, fuller life than before.

So what about you? Do you feel fulfilled with where you currently are in life? Do you desire "change"? Are you seeking answers that will ultimately lead you to a more abundant and prosperous life? Are you in transition and struggling to understand all that is taking place around you? Do you desire "gnosis"?

If so, then let me help you. I can assist you in finding the answers you seek. I can provide you with a more enlightened and fulfilling outlook at reality, and assist you in creating that reality as you wish.

I currently have a few spots open for one-on-one coaching and would like to invite you to join me on a journey that will change your life over the next few months. How I Manifested One Thousand Dollars in Thirty Minutes

By Daniel Hinds

First let me tell you that I have superseded that amount many times over but this story is one you are sure to love and may resonate with those who are still doubtful of what they can manifest. I am a big believer in the necessity of starting off easy and small as most people have a hard time in believing that they can manifest very large amounts of money.

Many years ago when I first learned the techniques of manifesting I had much to work out of my own system. I had manifested many things easily but somehow money always seemed like a big impossibility. I am sure you can relate to this as most people do.

We live in a reality that has programmed us to see money as elusive and impossible to obtain. Just our need for money alone keeps us bounded and fearful.

It can be quite hard to get away from that negative vibration of money when the very system that we live in keeps us in a state of fear and lack. Think about how your own banking system charges you outrageous fees to get out your own money, or how bill collectors hound you daily. Really I meet people everyday whose fear of money keeps them in a perpetual twist and imprisonment.

There are few people who have not experienced this fear and mental imprisonment of not having enough. That feeling alone keeps you in a very distinct vibration and no matter how hard you may try to release yourself from that vibration by thinking positive thoughts you cannot shift it.

Positive thoughts alone by themselves do not make you a strong magnetic force. It takes a deeper understanding of your vibration, how to alter it and raise it even higher in order to manifest faster and stronger.

My secret to manifesting that one thousand dollars came with one powerful manifesting mantra. That mantra did what I could not do on my own, which was to shift my vibration to such a very high octave. I was deeply in a state of frustration and about to loose more than I had when I discovered the power of that mantra. I went out into an open wooded place and began to sing the mantra.

Slowly I became lost in the sound, then slowly I felt my own fears and frustrations melting away. My vision became clearer and more pronounce. It had been many months that I could not settle down to calm my own mind and yet here I was feeling elevated to the sound current surging though me.

I needed one thousand dollars that was my request at that time, a small amount but also a large amount for me at that time many years ago. Before I could finish chanting that beautiful mantra my cell phone rang. It was a call from someone offering me a project to do, the offer was exactly one thousand dollars. I have since used this mantra to manifest many things all with outstanding results but no other story is as sweet as the first time I used it.

There are many greater secrets to manifesting that few people understand. Although mantras are powerful there are also tools that when added to it can give amazing results. The results can be quite magical.

Dream Prophecy:
What it Could Mean for YOU
By Joi Sigers

Do you remember the last dream you had? Were you being chased, looking for something you'd lost, or frustrated with a door that wouldn't open? Was a lost loved one in your dream and did they seem as alive as you are today?!

Maybe there were snakes in your dream and you still can't shake the eerie feelings they left you with.

Each of the types of dreams I listed above (in addition to the countless other dreams we have each night) are more than just dreams: They're messages.

No, I'm not going to say something like, "If you dream about snakes, you'll meet someone next week who'll give you a million dollars." You may or may not have such luck! But if you DID, it certainly wouldn't be because of the dream. Your sleeping mind doesn't really have any more information about what will happen next week than your "awake" mind does. The ancient dream guides that suggest otherwise are delightfully fun to read (I have a couple of them myself.) but accurate?

Thankfully, no. I've had a few dreams that would have surely cursed me if they were accurate!

While ancient dream guides serve little more of a purpose than amusement, Dream Analysis is a VERY worthwhile and helpful study. A modern dreamologist who is on top of his or her dream study can be incredibly helpful to you.

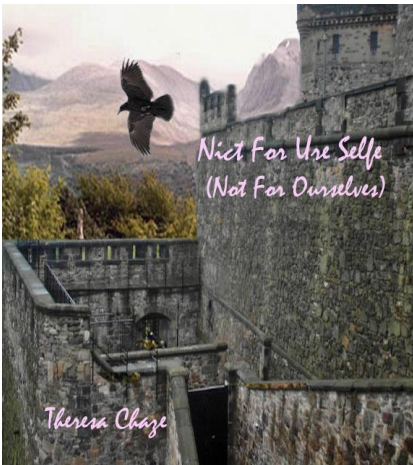

We all want to get the best that life has for us and we know that the only way to do that is to get the best out of ourselves. Having your dreams analyzed by a dreamologist is a simple, enjoyable, and fascinating tool to use to help make these things happen.

Remember, above, when I said, "Your sleeping mind doesn't really have any more information about what will happen next week than your 'awake' mind does."? Well, that's completely true, However, the sleeping, or unconscious, mind is more intune with what's going on in the present and the past. It's uncluttered or distracted by its environment-so it can completely delve into its emotions, thoughts, and issues. And that's exactly what it does-it dives right in.

However, for the individual who isn't familiar with dream symbolisms or the other particulars of dreams, the importance of the dreams will be lost forever! That's why it's so important to find someone who speaks the language of dreams and can help you to get to the bottom of your's.

In desperation, she performs a karmic ritual so that she may understand his hatred of her. Instead of a message, her soul takes her spirit back to the time when the Goddesses and Gods of old had not yet given way to the Christos and clan traditions could mean life or death. "Nict For Ure Selfe" (Not For Ourselves) a suspenseful tale of betrayal as traditions and love are tested by the changing times and greedy men whose lust for power continued into their next incarnations. The Law of Attraction:
The Weird and Wacky World of Metaphysics

By John Peace

Quantum science is going beyond the probe of atoms, and exploring the weird and wacky!

New words are entering science, new ideas, theories and dimensions, String Theory, Zero Point Energy Theory, and Membrane Theory to mention a few.

But the weird and wacky is not new to science, there has always been controversy and mystery in the science of the very little.

In ancient Greece there was a controversy about the nature of light. Euclid, Ptolemy and others thought that "light" was some sort of ray that travels from the eye to the observed object.

The atomists and Aristotle assumed the reverse. Nearly 800 years after Ptolemy, circa 965 CE, in Basra in what is now Iraq, Abu Ali al-Hasan Ibn al-Haytham (Alhazen) settled the controversy with a clever argument. He said that if you look at the Sun for a long time you will burn your eyes: this is only possible if the light is coming from the Sun to our eyes, not vice versa.

In 1672 another controversy erupted over the nature of light: Newton argued that light was some sort of a particle, so that light from the sun reaches the earth because these particles could travel through the vacuum.

Hooke and Huygens argued that light was some sort of wave. In 1801 Thomas Young put the matter to experimental test by doing a double slit experiment for light.

The result was an interference pattern. Thus, Newton must have been wrong: light had to be a wave.

The double-slit experiment contains a lot of the best aspects of the weirdness of quantum physics, for example a light shining through a small hole or slit (like in a pinhole camera) creates a spot of light on the screen (or film, or detector). However, light shown through two slits that are close together creates not two spots on the screen, but rather a series of alternating bright and dark lines with the brightest line in the exact middle of this interference pattern.

This shows that light is a wave since such a pattern results from the interference of the waves coming from each slit.

However, in the year 1900 physicist Max Planck showed that certain other effects in physics could only be explained by light being a particle. Many experiments followed to also show that light was indeed also a particle (a "photon") and Albert Einstein was awarded the Nobel Prize in physics in 1921 for his work showing that the particle nature of light could explain the "photoelectric effect."

This was an experiment whereby low energy (red) light, when shining onto a photoelectric material, caused the material to emit low energy (slow moving) electrons, while high energy (blue) light caused the same material to emit high energy (fast moving) electrons.

However, lots of red light only ever produced more low energy electrons, never any high-energy electrons.

In other words, the energy could not be "saved up" but rather must be absorbed by the electrons in the photoelectric material individually. The conclusion was that light came in packets, little quantities, and behaved thus as a particle as well as a wave.

So light is both a particle and a wave. OK, kind of unexpected, but perhaps not totally weird.

But the double slit experiment had another trick up its sleeve. One could send one photon (or "quantum" of energy) through a single slit at a time, with a sufficiently long interval in between, and eventually a spot builds up that looks just like the one produced when a very intense (many photons) light was sent through the slit.

But then a strange thing happened. When one sends a single photon at a time (waiting between each laser pulse, for example) toward the screen when both slits are open, rather than two spots eventually building up opposite the two slit openings, what eventually builds up is the interference pattern of alternating bright and dark lines!

Hmm... how can this be, if only one photon was sent through the apparatus at a time?

The answer is that each individual photon must—in order to have produced an interference pattern—have gone through both slits!

This, the simplest of quantum weirdness experiments, has been the basis of many of the unintuitive interpretations of quantum physics.

We can see, perhaps, how physicists might conclude, for example, that a particle of light is not a particle until it is measured at the screen. It turns out that the particle of light is rather a wave before it is measured. But it is not a wave in the ocean-wave sense.

It is not a wave of matter but rather, it turns out that it is apparently a wave of probability. That is, the elementary particles making up the trees, people, and planets--what we see around us -- are apparently just distributions of likelihood until they are measured (that is, measured or observed).

So much for the Victorian view of solid matter!

The shock of matter being largely empty space may have been extreme enough -- if an atom were the size of a huge cathedral, then the electrons would be dust particles floating around at all distances inside the building, while the nucleus, or center of the atom, would be smaller than a sugar cube.

But with quantum physics, even this tenuous result would be superseded by the atom itself not really being anything that exists until it is measured.

One might rightly ask, then, what does it mean to measure something? And this brings us to the Uncertainly Principle first discovered by Werner Heisenberg.

Dr. Heisenberg wrote, "Some physicist would prefer to come back to the idea of an objective real world whose smallest parts exist objectively in the same sense as stones or trees exist independently of whether we observe them. This however is impossible."

If this was not wierd enough, along came the absolute wacky in the shape of Entanglement!

Entanglement shows us that it is possible to link together two quantum particles, photons of light or atoms, for example, in a special way that makes them effectively two parts of the same entity.

You can then separate them as far as you like, and a change in one is instantly reflected in the other. This odd, faster than light link, is a fundamental aspect of quantum science. Erwin Schodinger, who came up with the name entanglement, called it 'the characteristic trait of quantum mechanics.'

Entanglement is fascinating in its own right, but what makes it really special are dramatic practical applications that have become apparent in the last few years.

Is it possible that entangled particles are not actually in immediate communication, but are simply programmed to behave in the same way? Much like twins separated at birth who live eerily similar lives-assume the same professions or marry similar spouses.

If you take some property of a particle, the equivalent of color, say the spin of an electron, it does not have the value pre-programmed. It has a range of probabilities as to what the answer might be, but until you actually measure it, there is no fixed value.

What happens with a pair of entangled electrons is you measure the spin of one. Until that moment, neither of them had a spin with a fixed value. But the instant you take the measurement on one, the other immediately fixes its spin (say to the opposite value).

These quantum bits were every possible color until you looked at one. Only then did it become pink, and the other instantly took on another color.

Einstein among other scientists could not accept quantum entanglement. It seems to throw out the whole notion of cause and effect, so how confident are physicists that quantum entanglement exists and what are the implications for science and the scientific method?

Einstein had problems with the whole of quantum physics which is ironic, as it was based on his Nobel Prize winning paper on the photoelectric effect. What he did not like was the way quantum particles do not have fixed values for their properties until they are observed, and he couldn't relate to a universe where probability ruled.

That's why he famously said that God doesn't play dice. I think an even better quote, less well known, was when he wrote: 'I find the idea quite intolerable that an electron exposed to radiation should choose of its own free will, not only its moment to jump off, but also its direction.

In that case, I would rather be a cobbler, or even an employee in a gaming house, than a physicist.'

Einstein believed that underneath these probabilities were fixed, hidden realities we just couldn't see. That was why he dreamed up the idea of entanglement in 1935.

It was to show that either quantum theory was incomplete, because it said there was no hidden information, or it was possible to instantly influence something at a distance. As that seemed incredible, he thought it showed that quantum theory was wrong.

It did take a long time to prove that entanglement truly existed.

It wasn't until the 1980s that it was clearly demonstrated. But it has been shown without doubt that this is the case.

Entanglement exists, and is being used in very practical ways.

Entanglement doesn't throw away the concept of cause and effect. But it does underline the fact that quantum particles really do only have a range of probabilities on the values of their properties rather than fixed values. And while it seems to contradict Einsteins special relativity, which says nothing can travel faster than light, its more likely that entanglement challenges our ideas of what distance and time really mean. Similarly, entanglement is no challenge to the scientific method.

We need to use a different kind of math, but this is still the same science

With Gratitude and until next time.

Elemental Fire
by Kevin W. Fuller

The Fire. The Central Fire of Hestia, from the Greeks. That primordial Fire that ignites the Cosmos. The suns rays, say the alchemists, strike the earth and turn the clay into diamonds and gold and silver and lead. All these metals are said to have the fire of the sun, the philosophical gold in them. Some, like lead, are just slower than others to turn into gold.

There are rocks, ruled by earth, metals, ruled by water, plants, ruled by air, and animals, ruled by fire. And Fire is the first igniter of all the natural processes when looking at the wheel of the elements.

Fire dominates and initiates hot, cold, dry moist, the four ancient qualities. Fire turns to earth turns to water turns to air and back to fire again. The great cycle constantly being played out throughout the physical universe, mimicing the celestial.

If you can look at the most frozen piece of ice and see the fire in the frost of it, you're starting to get a hint of the ubiquity of Fire.

Fire, to the ancients, was associated with Intellect. Fire is thwarted by Air, and is at it's best when it is directed. And so goes the intellect. We don't want to be airheads, do we? We want focus when we're using our noggins, we want to direct our bodies from the top down.

Continuing on, what is burning, say again the alchemists, is the sulphur, the oily flow of ignited wood. What is evaporated, continue the alchemists, is mercury.

Finally, again the alchemists say, what is left after the fire has gone out, ash, is salt.
These are the three manifestations of material, according to the alchemists, sulphur, salt and mercury.

But the key, the key was the fire. You had to have the proper fire burning before you could turn the lead into gold. Which again points to the mind. If you want to accomplish something, you gotta have the proper attitude, the right frame of mind, in order to turn the dull, leaden experience of day to day life into something precious, gold. And the central hearth is the heart. It issues from the heart, and travels to the head and results in right action. But the secret is, it all begins with Fire.

Pray for wisdom to return.

Pray for tolerance to return.

Pray for respect to return.

Pray for love to return.

For it is the only way for us to have peace.

By asking for them all and expecting them to become a reality, we create what we seek.

Don't be afraid to be the candle in the dark.

If you look around, you'll find you are not alone.
